One day I woke up and knew that, while the scales never would be balanced, my work at the cemeteries was completed.

Afternoons, weather permitting, my sisters and I would spread a quilt beneath the large maple that held pride of place on the back corner of what we referred to as The Lot. Perhaps it's a little more gritty and "real" than I like my books.

Too quickly, our two hours were over—four train-related quizzes with prizes,

Rain, snow, sleet or hail, he waited each morning at the end of our street to walk with me to school, and each afternoon, no matter how much I dallied, he trudged along beside me on my way home. Dead billionaires are not good for business!

You watched a lady in a starched apron place the first foil tent over a roasting for:
