Caldwell's flat, descriptive as opposed to experiential prose style suddenly catches fire and is terribly evocative to anyone who has lived through the waking nightmare of consultations with too many doctors, bedside vigils counting breaths, phone calls that turn into five alarm bells. Movies like Rambo and make fighting look almost fun. This book chronicles Caldwell's friendship with Knapp, which was set in motion by both of them being single women who cared deeply about their dogs, and comparing their experiences. The story of the book is the epidural, where everything went wrong. There are lots of metaphors and background about the author to suggest she's an elitist struggling with a fragile ego but not nearly enough to tell me why their friendship was so magical. If you haven't, this honest and liberating memoir will help you find one. But if you want to write a powerful memoir, well Lists with This Book. This I would not lose. She takes him to an orphanage called Nava Jeevan and spends several weeks trying to find his family.
