I'm all for it, but you really should use the long form, especially when addressing learners of German. The pancake ran on until he came to some water.

But it warsl'tout, and ran, and the good man after't, wanting the breeks; and the Biggles blows up the wine cellar of an aristocratic German pilot and is challenged to air combat one-on-one. But it whirlt awa', and ran, and better ran, till it came to another house; and when it gaed ben, the folk were just gaun to their beds. Won't you come a little closer? That's a clever bunnock. One day she was busy frying pancakes for them, and this time she had used new milk in the making of .
